Abstract

Currently, language learning using technology has become a common method used in both urban and rural areas with a technology-based learning system. This study is entitled "Exploring High School Students' Motivating and Demotivating Factors in Using Technology-Enhanced Learning for Remote English Education". This study aims to identify and analyze the motivational factors experienced by students when implementing technology-based learning in remote areas for English language education, and also, to find out the demotivational factors students face when implementing technology-based learning in remote areas for English language education. This research uses a qualitative research approach and offers descriptive qualitative analysis. This research was conducted in one of the state senior high schools in Natuna. In addition, this research involved six students in the state senior high school as participants in this research. In collecting data, this study used standardized open-ended interviews. The first finding shows that the researcher found several findings related to students' perceptions of motivational factors in technology-based learning in remote areas in a senior high school in Natuna. These five factors have been explained in the findings section. The findings are access to resources, self-paced learning, independence, interactive learning, and a variety of learning modalities. Some factors that influence students' learning experience are: The second finding revealed that several conclusions on how students perceived demotivating elements in technology-assisted learning in isolated locations in one of the Natuna high schools. These five strategies have been described in the findings section. The findings are limited Access to Technology, distractions, language Barriers, assessment Challenges, and socioeconomic Factors.
